

Chapter One

It was a bright cold day in the small village, and the clocks were striking thirteen in the town square below.

Winston walked quickly through the narrow streets, his collar turned up against the wind that blew that morning.

He had almost reached the door when he noticed the sign in the window had been changed overnight.

A new paragraph begins here, safely separated by a gap.

Chapter Two

The second chapter opens on an entirely different scene, far from the streets of the first chapter's opening pages.